

Markets work best when:

1. They are reasonably competitive—in other words, there are several buyers and sellers,
2. Buyers and sellers have access to sufficient reliable information,
3. Resources are relatively mobile and free to move from one use to another in response to changing conditions, and
4. Market prices reflect the full costs and benefits of production and exchange.